In the News

Johnny Lupinacci has been awarded the annual Research Award from the Washington Educational Research Association (WERA). Lupinacci is an assistant professor in the Cultural Studies and Social Thought in Education program. His research focuses on ecological perspectives in place-based social studies education and working with teachers and school leaders to address environmental justice in connection with environmental racism in classrooms and communities. <https://insider.wsu.edu/2018/01/30/faculty-member-receives-wera-research-award/>

An article titled, Rethinking the Use of Tests: A Meta-Analysis of Practice Testing made the American Educational Research Association's list of the 10 most-read education research articles for 2017. Sola Adesope, an educational psychologist, served as lead author of the article. It was co-written by doctoral students Dominic Trevisan (Simon Fraser University) and Kripa Sundararajan (WSU). <https://insider.wsu.edu/2018/01/09/educational-psychology-article-among-nations-most-read/>
